

Acknowledgments

As indicated in the Introduction, the immediate occasion for writing this essay is the appearance of Keynes' major writings on monetary theory in the edition of The Collected Writings of John Maynard Keynes which is now being published by the Royal Economic Society under the general editorship of Sir Austin Robinson. Let me accordingly first express my sincerest appreciation to the Society for generously granting me permission to cite at length from the various volumes of this edition.

Despite the wealth of material presented in this edition, I have felt the need at various points in this essay to obtain supplementary information, as well as additional unpublished documents from the Keynes Papers, which are deposited in the Marshall Library of Cambridge University. In this connection, I cannot adequately express my gratitude to Lord Kahn (who is Keynes' executor) and also to Donald Moggridge (who edited Volumes XIII and XIV of the Collected Writings from the aforementioned Papers) for the unflinching spirit of scholarly cooperation with which they patiently and expeditiously met my every request for assistance. I am also indebted to Lord Kahn for permission to cite the unpublished documents that were so supplied.

Most of the material in this essay was first presented and further developed in the seminar on the history of modern monetary thought which I have given at the Hebrew University during the past three years. As always, it is a pleasure to express my deep gratitude and indebtedness to the students of these seminars for their many valuable criticisms and suggestions. But it is a pleasure mixed with sadness: for among the most active participants in these seminar-discussions were Avner Ben-Eliezer and Yoav Brum.

An earlier version of this essay was circulated in the fall of 1974, and I have benefited greatly from the stimulating comments and criticisms which I then received from many individuals. In this context my debt is particularly great to Sir John Hicks, with whom I spent many pleasant and extremely fruitful hours discussing the manuscript at a conference convened by the Latsis Foundation in September 1974 at Nafplion, Greece—for quite other purposes! These invaluable discussions were followed by a further highly illuminating correspondence with Sir John on various points.

This early version was also much improved as a result of stimulating and valuable discussions of it (carried out mostly by means of correspondence) with William Baumol, Stanley Fischer, Donald Moggridge, and Donald Winch. Again, I derived much help and stimulation from the critical comments on this version that were made by three referees. On various points, I was also greatly aided by the comments and advice of my colleagues Chaim Barkai, Yoram Ben-Porath, and Ephraim Kleiman.

The material of this essay also served as the subject of the graduate seminar which I have given at the University of Western Ontario during my successive month-long visits there in the past two years. I would like to thank Kevin Burley, Joel Fried, and Peter Howitt for the helpful comments I received from them in the course of these visits.

I would also like to express my warm appreciation to Elizabeth Johnson (who has edited several volumes of Keynes' Collected Writings) for the many illuminating conversations that I had with her. And I have a special debt to Harry Johnson for encouraging me to publish this essay as a separate monograph. Needless to say, none of the individuals who have been mentioned here is to be held responsible for the views expressed in this essay.

Any study of this kind necessarily entails a heavy burden of library work and checking of texts and references. Here I have been blessed with a succession of excellent research assistants whose help has been invaluable: Leonardo Leiderman and Gabriella Brenner, as well as (in the preliminary stages of the work) Akiva Offenbacher. To all of them I am deeply indebted for the gratifying responsibility and accuracy with which they carried out their tasks, as well as for the many valuable comments and suggestions which they have provided.

Similarly, I owe a special debt to Mrs. Vera Jacobs, who has loyally and conscientiously devoted herself—with great care, accuracy, and patience—to typing this essay through its many drafts and revisions. Her pleasant and most efficient help has greatly lightened the burden of preparing this essay. I am also indebted to Mrs. Margaret Gower and her staff at the University of Western Ontario for the typing assistance which they have so expeditiously provided during my successive visits to that university.

Thanks are also due to the registrars and other officials of various colleges at Cambridge and Oxford, who have kindly provided some of the information used in the description of the dramatis personae which appears below.

I would like now to express my sincerest appreciation to the Ford Foundation for a grant received through the Israel Foundation Trustees which enabled me to devote my free time to work on this essay. Grants to cover the costs of research and typing assistance were received in the first stage of this work from the Central Research Fund of the Hebrew University, and in subsequent stages from the Israel Commission for Basic Research—and I am most indebted to them. I am also grateful to the Maurice Falk Institute for Economic Research in Israel and to the Van Leer Jerusalem Foundation for the kind assistance they have provided throughout this work.

Let me also express my thanks to the editors of the Economic Journal for their kind permission to reproduce in Chapter 2 of this essay much of my review article on “The Collected Writings of John Maynard Keynes: From the Tract to the General Theory,” which appeared in the June 1975 issue of the Journal.

I would like finally to express my deepest appreciation to the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, whose quiet studies, overlooking the southern hills of Jerusalem, have provided the ideal scholarly atmosphere for carrying out the work on this essay.

Jerusalem, July 1975

Don Patinkin