Electroencephalography (EEG) changes were observed in the frontal lobe in younger and older age groups. EEG alterations were more pronounced in the younger group, suggesting that these changes might contribute to the development of motor impairments in early stages of PD. The results highlight the importance of early diagnosis and intervention in PD to prevent the progression of motor impairments.